The majority of retinal dendritic cells belong to the Langerhans cell lineage, and are characterized by the expression of the myeloid/histiocyte antigen CD1a. They develop early in life in the utricle and in the visual tract of the developing eye. To date, in situ localization of the Langerhans cell lineage in the retina and visual pathway has been mainly studied with immunohistochemical markers and enzyme histochemistry. Our interest in the spatial organization of the dendritic cell network in the retina originates from the observation that the dendritic cells in the retina and visual pathway display a certain degree of plasticity. It has been demonstrated by light- and electron-microscopic immunohistochemistry and in situ hybridization that the dendritic cell network is dynamic
