Copy protection is a type of copy prevention in computer software. It is implemented to prevent copies of computer programs. Non-trivial means a software application that uses either copyrightable or patented technology. The technology can be hardware, software, or some combination of both. Such applications are often distributed over the Internet. Digital rights management (DRM) is similar to copy protection, except that it is intended to be reversed with a specialized reverse engineering effort. The copyright holder can impose various types of controls on the access to the content, including penalties to unauthorized devices and various technical and procedural barriers. Copyright protection is intended to prevent unauthorized copying, including the distribution of music and other works over computer networks. DRM is used to enforce these controls and in some cases it can be as strong or stronger than the copy protection on the content itself.
