Players of games, such as digital games, have always had a desire to satisfy their curiosity with the progress of a game. In digital games, it is very important to watch a complex computation process that involves the execution of a number of steps. Therefore, a game does not automatically cease when a player is asked to move on to the next stage of the game. Usually, players have to continuously keep their eyes on the screen and their mental faculties devoted to the game. However, watching the computation process is mentally burdensome. In the case of a gaming system with a large computation load, it is difficult for players to continue playing. The computations involved in games generally involve a very complicated execution process. For example, when an object falls down from above and bounces back onto the ground, the position of the object just before it fell onto the ground is calculated using a number of complex mathematical formulas. If this calculation is performed in the main calculation cycle, the calculation process takes a short time. However, in a game system, the main calculation cycle is very short and the calculation is normally performed in a sub-program. Therefore, the computation process has to be performed by interrupting the main calculation cycle. During this interrupt process, a player must watch the progress of the calculation process. This may cause the game to be interrupted for the player's attentiveness. Furthermore, the calculation process requires the information on the object, such as its shape, size, and position, which must be extracted from a memory in the main calculation cycle and saved in the first sub
