Research Shows Early Memory Loss in Young Adults Researchers from Cornell University have found that many young adults -- as young as 19 years old -- experience a decrease in certain kinds of memory after just a few months of participating in a longitudinal study. The study, published in the journal Scientific Reports, points to a decrease in episodic memory -- a type of memory that allows people to remember specific events -- in young adults, which may be related to a decline in sleep quality. Episodic memory is linked to sleep and, according to a 2015 study from the NIMH and the University of Pennsylvania, which found that sleep deprivation impairs the storage of newly learned information and memory. According to the study, this decrease in episodic memory was greatest for people aged 20 to 25. "Episodic memory is very important for a young adult's ability to learn new skills and keep current with their current knowledge and interests," said corresponding author Dr. Natasha A. Carey, a doctoral student in Cornell's Department of Psychology. "It's also important for the ability to face new challenges and make decisions in life." The researchers found that about 10 percent of 19-year-olds who participated in a study between November 2013 and June 2015, when they were visiting Cornell to collect data, reported a reduction in episodic memory by about seven months later. "These changes in episodic memory occur surprisingly quickly, but we need more data to see what impact these changes have on young adults' cognitive abilities and psychological well-being," said Dr. Paul M. Slagter, Cornell's Paul L. Gerlach Professor of Psychology and senior author of the study. "With this study, we hope to help fill that gap by measuring young adults' memory at the start of the study and at the end." In their study, the researchers noted that the decrease in memory in these young adults may be related to their sleep duration and quality. Sleep plays a key role in episodic memory. The research team measured a group of young adults' sleep over five nights, including at least three nights of sleep. In the morning of the sixth night, they tested the participants' memory for the sequence of events in a brief story and then tested the participants' memory for that story again after an eight- to 11-week delay. The researchers found a positive correlation between the participants' recent sleep duration and episodic memory. The more sleep the participants had, the better they remembered the story

NAVAL AIR STATION CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. -- Thirty-one years to the day that three of the most feared members of a criminal organization detonated a bomb in the parking lot of a New York City shopping mall, FBI agents and others arrested a number of members of the group April 19 in the parking lot of the Naval Air Station in western Massachusetts. As the criminal organization's leader and his longtime military bodyguard left the building, they were pursued by police and FBI agents. One defendant attempted to grab an FBI agent's gun while another defendant stabbed a police officer's hand with a screwdriver. All four defendants -- Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, members Hugo Calderon-Valencia, Gustavo Suarez, Alexander Perez and Carlos Perez -- were charged with conspiracy to murder and conspiracy to distribute marijuana. The gang is based in El Salvador, and the members originally migrated from there to the United States in the 1980s. At approximately 4 p.m. on April 19, 2012, Salvadoran authorities arrested the leader, a Salvadoran national and a resident of El Salvador, who was the head of a criminal organization operating in El Salvador and the United States. Court documents allege the defendant had intimate knowledge of a sophisticated, multi-million dollar marijuana-trafficking organization that operated in El Salvador and New York. Court documents also allege the defendant was responsible for planning, and with others, executing the shooting death of a member of a rival gang outside a New York City hospital in 2010. Court documents also allege the defendant was responsible for recruiting members of the MS-13 gang, and protecting MS-13's growing operations in El Salvador and the United States. A short time later, police and FBI agents observed the defendant leaving the building with an unidentified woman and a man. The three men ran, but were captured and arrested following an approximately 30-minute chase. The defendant then allegedly retrieved a gun from his pants pocket and, while holding the gun in his right hand, struck the hand of one of the agents. Meanwhile, an FBI helicopter was hovering near the area and agents were able to see the men before they could make it to the side of the building. Police attempted to restrain the four men, but were met with blows and tussles. Calderon-Valencia allegedly attacked a police officer, while Suarez and Perez fought with police officers. While the four men were struggling, Suarez allegedly stabbed
