AISnips is an interactive learning tool that allows you to teach your students, or staff, about the history of nib technology in the UK. The Story Following the Napier-Drew milling machine revolution in the 1830's, the development of the British metal-pointed writing pen was entirely dictated by the design and typeface requirements of the burgeoning world market of newspapers, journals and periodicals. It was the "penny newspaper" which drove pen and pencil manufacturers to continually innovate and improve. The first metal nibs were initially made of brass, and the basic standard 1st generation nib point designs are still in use today. Each newspaper demanded their own typeface nibs, and these became, in turn, a standard and de facto reference. What had been made in haste and with little attention to the future, became accepted as the traditional way of doing things. As these presses became mechanized, production became more standardized and set patterns began to emerge, driven by the need to produce as many copies of the same newspapers, journals and periodicals as quickly and economically as possible. The shift to cheaper, "mass" production printers saw different nib types emerge. With these, the early publishers began to appreciate the limitations of the earlier standard nibs and from then on looked to the emerging mechanical pencils to fill the gaps. Welcome to the AISnips!
