The goal of the proposed Phase I research program is to develop a novel, bionic nose that is capable of detecting and identifying many disease causing agents and/or toxins. This device will facilitate improved air quality monitoring for both commercial buildings and health care facilities. The device will be capable of identifying pollutants in the air of a facility, and will alert and report the monitoring facility of pollutant issues or even health hazards. The potential market for these instruments will be numerous and diverse. Commercial buildings will use the system to protect their workers, and health care facilities will use them to identify and track the spread of disease. Designing and constructing the device will be a multi-step process using open technologies and readily available resources, including many open source software packages. Once completed and ready for customer trials and testing, the system will be offered to health care facilities around the country at a cost of approximately one-tenth of current health care costs. PROPOSED COMMERCIAL APPLICATION: This system will be capable of detecting and identifying many disease causing agents and/or toxins. The system will assist in detecting and/or controlling the spread of diseases and will greatly improve air quality monitoring for both commercial buildings and health care facilities. The potential market for these instruments will be numerous and diverse.
