the developing of these so-called high-end cameras by John Hilton have also made large quantities of the hammarlund F30's equivalent by sony. But this time, they've made sure the images taken are a bit more sharp, and have packed them in to a box less than half the size. And the price! The F30 all-in-one is now just $39 and comes with a 12.1MP sensor capable of images as sharp as 1300 ppi. It's up to the user to decide what that's worth. Or what they don't want to pay for. And if the F30 is all about speed, is Fujifilm's new GFX50 Pro. The GFX50 Pro has a 30.6MP X-Trans CMOS II sensor capable of 13.2-megapixel images, and has a refresh rate of 10 fps. It is almost half the size and price of the Fujifilm GFX50 with 18.1MP sensor for $549. The F30 is Fuji's answer to the Sony A65, which has an APS-C sensor with a very similar 18.1MP resolution, but retails for $1700. Both the F30 and the GFX50 Pro are up for pre-order and will begin shipping in May 2014. If the phone Samsung gives its users for Christmas is non-waterproof, I'm making a cartoon describing my wish for a phone with a water-resistant body. And here's what could be possible. Popular YouTuber Andro Instru-kit recently released a full tutorial on how to recreate this comic. He uses a T-rex, rubber duckies and a lump of clay and demonstrates how the robot can be made. While the phone is covering in clay, he does it gently, using dipping tweezers. The result? Because the phone is not waterproof completely, it sinks into the rubber ducky. If you're wondering if this would work with a regular rubber duck, yes, it will work. What do you think? Would you like to see a real waterproof phone? Sound off in the comment section below.
