A simple animation would allow you to see a great point of view of the title, a colorful logo, and two words to remind you to buy the game. All that was needed was the most awaited indie game which is Dark Souls Remastered: I did some test runs and found out that I could get most of the way there with basic animations and a P5 engine. The final frame of the Blue world is simple, but you will have to animate the little Wrist and Hands to make them do the correct animation. The secret of this tutorial is to animate a very simple CharacterController so it should be pretty easy to understand. We start with the original Dark Souls so all of the code must be recreated from scratch. And here we go! It's a gentle start! Animation = 30 fps / 30 frames per second =.0333 seconds per frame. In the previous video, we found out that 60 pixels would just do to make the animation and it was enough to explain our framework, so that's what we used in this tutorial. (You can find the code in the Github repository) Here's the animation: We could make it even better with some more gradule models for the woman's hand, the man's arms and the woman's wrist. Animated Text I would like to point out that having 0 "back to previous page" text, you can't return to the main menu, but you can stay in the title screen! Alright, let's continue! Animation = 60 fps / 30 frames per second =.0333 seconds per frame. Note that the script can be run with source code files or through an online interpreter like Animation = 60 fps / 60 frames per second =.001 seconds per frame. Create a new script using the following code: using UnityEngine; using System.Collections; public class TitleScreen : MonoBehaviour { private Animator animator; void 3e33713323
