What's New In?

Time-lapse movies are a funny and simple way to make time-lapse movies. Your pictures are captured, then saved and merged into a video. I wrote this Flix program because I was bored while doing my homework. After some time working on it, I thought that it is cool, and so I would like to share it with you. The main window looks like this: On the left, the various timeslapse intervals are shown, which can be changed manually: The capture rate (fotografias por segundo) is also shown, which means that the movie will be slowed down. On the top, you have the status of the time-lapse process. If you close the program, it will continue to capture images. Otherwise, it will stop. To the right, there is a list of the images that will be merged in the movie. If you press the "Start" button, the program will start capturing images. When the process is finished, you can change the interval between the images by clicking on the "Stop" button. If you want to, you can adjust the speed of the movie by pressing the "Adjust" button. The program can also change the output movie format, which is by default H.264. Finally, you can change the sound track that will be played while the movie is being captured (I made a simple but effective one for this). If you have trouble with it, try using a PC. For Linux users, the problem is that the program will not write in the directory specified in the config file. This is due to an incompatibility between the program and the distribution of Linux that I'm using. Unfortunately, I have no time to fix it. I don't know if I can fix it in the next version of the program. If you're using the freeware version, you can try removing the config file (just copy it to the trash, then remove it). It will probably work. If you're using the professional version, you can also try to run the program as administrator. Both approaches should work.
