1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a monolithic ceramic substrate and a semiconductor device incorporating the substrate. More particularly, the invention relates to a high-density, high-power monolithic ceramic substrate which is suitable for use as a semiconductor device substrate and a semiconductor device incorporating the substrate.

2. Description of the Prior Art Heretofore, semiconductor devices incorporating monolithic ceramic substrates for accommodating a semiconductor chip or the like have been produced using mainly MgO—CaO—Al₂O₃ ceramics as ceramic materials. These ceramics, however, have an electric resistance as high as 5.0 MΩ·cm, and hence, they present problems with regard to their electric characteristics. In view of this, ceramic materials of low electric resistance, called high-temperature ceramics, have been developed in recent years in order to solve the above problem, and examples of ceramic materials of low electric resistance include zirconia containing yttria (Y₂O₃), zirconia doped with Al₂O₃, and aluminum nitride. Besides the monolithic ceramic substrates, ceramic packages including monolithic ceramic substrates have been developed and put to practical use. For instance, there have been known a case in which a semiconductor chip is hermetically sealed in a ceramic package using Si₃N₄ in order to prevent the influence of an atmosphere on the semiconductor chip, and a case in which a semiconductor chip is hermetically sealed in a ceramic package using Pb in order to reduce a reaction of the semiconductor chip with an atmosphere. However, the known ceramic packages exhibit a problem in that the coefficient of thermal expansion is so different between the ceramic substrates and the ceramic packages that the thermal cycle life (thermal shock resistance) is lowered. Furthermore, it is difficult to integrate a semiconductor chip or the like on
