There was a time when the idea of using free bits for privacy and anonymity was so novel and amazing that people would stand in front of a class of students and tell them: “This is the most amazing thing, don’t you know?” Now the researchers in the field have discovered that not only does it work, but it also works for more than just Bitcoin. A paper that’s been more than a year in the making, and that I’ve already accepted for publication in the IEEE Transactions on Vehicular Technology, discloses a new technique for passively transmitting not only secrets in encrypted form, but also actual one-time-use keys necessary for encryption. This means that if someone is eavesdropping on the link, all they see is garbled noise. To decode the secrets, they would need to look at other factors, such as who is sending the messages, and how often they use the trick. And they would see the data arrive when it is supposed to arrive, and disappear when it is supposed to disappear. The technique works for any network, wireless or wired, and it can be employed without modifying or learning the size of the key that has been used. It’s a proof-of-concept, and should be viewed as such, since it takes a big chunk out of the work of decrypting everything. The researchers are appropriately cagey about the technical details, so the new technique may appear a bit sketchy. But the idea is there. “
