Is there a way to make the top-most part of a button a textured/shiny plastic or glass panel with an annular cut out in the middle? I'd like to have a very clean, simple and professional looking button. The top most part is part of a plastic sheet. I'd like to have a shiny/textured panel in the center of that sheet, with an annular cut out in the middle. How can I achieve this in Blender? I'm working on the 2.8 version. A: How about using a texture node to create the effect? In the example below I used a beveled patch to create the result: Here's a quick render with an emitter in front of a diffuse surface to create a glow: You can modify the 'emitter_intensity' for the glow effect. This texture can then be animated with keyframes and applied to the whole scene. The shader in the example uses the 'Base Color' to control the appearance and the 'Alpha' to control the thickness of the texture (the more opaque the texture, the darker the disc appears): You can use as many textures as you want and append them to the diffuse node. Here's another example with a few more textures: Keep in mind that the textures in this example are using a very basic texture coordinate map and assigning them to the same UV coordinate doesn't help to apply different textures in the correct areas. It's also possible to animate the textures across the surface of the texture node, e.g. using a loop for each material slot. Below is a more involved example with shaders that uses different texture coordinates to achieve a "fake" beveled effect: Shaders used Blend File Q: How to tell if SSH session is running on command line or X11?
