Stressful life events, life history, and posttraumatic stress symptoms among postpartum women. Studies have found that an elevated risk of postpartum depression is associated with a range of stressful life events. However, in most studies of postpartum depression, events have been examined in isolation from other potentially important life-course antecedents and predictors of depressive outcomes. Using the adaptation of the life-course model to predict postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptomatology, we investigated the extent to which stressful life events and the resulting distress would predict postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptomatology in a sample of postpartum women. The overall contribution of life events to explaining postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptoms, while controlling for positive and negative life events and context specificity were examined. The sample included 261 postpartum women who had experienced stressful life events and who were more likely to have had a history of depression or anxiety and who exhibited more postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptoms.

Life events moderated the relationship between previous history of depression and posttraumatic stress symptoms and predicted postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptoms in a sample of postpartum women. The results indicated that previous history of depression and life events explained unique portions of the variance in postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptoms among women. Findings are discussed in the context of recommendations for future research on the antecedents and predictors of postpartum stress and postnatal and posttraumatic stress symptomatology.1) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor device. Far Outweigh Boost in Funds for Education Unless Congress acts in the next few months, school districts across the nation will face the most severe budget cuts in their history, affecting everything from teachers to students to school administrators. The cuts will be as dramatic as the recession, which has left states across the board with shrinking budgets and deficits. Almost 40 states, including California and Texas, have calculated $27 billion in cuts this fall. In many districts, the cuts from the mid-1990s won't be half that, and there are few signs that such deep cuts will pass. But the main federal education law, the No Child Left Behind Act, will still constrain school budgets, keep textbooks from being replaced and pressure state and local governments to restructure their school funding. "The No Child Left Behind act will do nothing but cut," said Andrea Weatherman, a spokeswoman for the National Education Association. "States will have to figure out how to deal with it, and that will not be easy."

Approximately two-thirds of school districts nationally will face severe or significant cuts this year and next year, according to an analysis released last week by the District Finance Council, an association of Washington-area school administrators. From 2000 to 2004, only 15 percent of districts nationwide had faced cuts of similar severity. The fear of such cuts, common in the wake of the Clinton and George W. Bush administration's education policies, has pushed districts to increase class sizes and eliminate high school band, gym and music programs. Instead of the kind of increased spending governors say they want, the cuts will force states to fund universities, community colleges and child care programs, even as their public school budgets are cut. So states are already seeking new sources of revenue as part of the comprehensive initiative that Washington has been promoting this year. "It's going to be painful, because people are going to be hurt," said David V. Jones, director of the Center for School Finance Research at Temple University. "But if people aren't hitting the pockets of the wealthy and upper-income, it will also be painful for those who don't have a lot of money to give." The recession has produced more funding cuts, which put the National Education Association "on alert," said Mr. Weatherman, based in Sacramento, where the union represents 850,000 people. The NEA's recent advocacy has included giving states "black eyes" for being too stingy with their funding,
