And for more video from the latest FIFA game check out this video created by the guys from PCGBlog.com This year's game also marks the introduction of brand new player controls, and in the build I've been testing over the last few days, I'm delighted to announce they're even better than in last year's edition of the game. Unlike FIFA 19, where controls felt convoluted and hard to get to grips with, this year I've found them much clearer, more intuitive and precise. As well as the usual share of handy little control additions, like the ability to leap off the ground with more finesse and the ability to dive elegantly off of your own player. The team moves are also more reactive and perceptive to what they need to do, no longer being wedded to predictable movements that hindered the game as much as they alleviated its problems. FIFA 20 had a lot of learning curves and grew stronger as we all got used to it, but you could really tell that the game was growing from strength to strength as you played more and more. With FIFA 21 the development team took things even further, introducing new ways to play football like the goalkeeper, new player control setup, and new physics. With FIFA
