The Cinematic Imagination: The Frontiers of Film Music (Part 1) The Cinematic Imagination: The Frontiers of Film Music (Part 1) The Cinematic Imagination: The Frontiers of Film Music (Part 1)

In this lecture we'll look at the history of film music, especially during its first half century, which roughly covers the time period between the end of the nineteenth century to the late nineteen seventies. We'll look at the ways in which composers and musicians as well as filmmakers challenged long-held assumptions of what music was and was meant to accomplish. Songs and movements that were the product of a new cinematic imagination seemed to be exploring a new world while drawing on musical ideas, forms and devices from a range of sources, including early music, tone poems, even early cinema. In addition to grappling with film theory and criticism, we'll also discuss how the emerging medium of film music shaped our views of time, form, memory and perception. It is important to note that music on film is by no means a new phenomenon. Music has been an important part of the cinematic experience since the earliest days of film in the late 1890s. At that time, film composers were often musicians, and film scores were mostly short compositions with

, Themes, Ideas, Outtakes, and other Audio Products Performing the Message The executives of Osogeisha and Nobu, two of Japan's most famous media equities, are now dead. The explanation for their passing is available to those able to read Japanese—more about it on Osogeisha and Nobu, below—but the one detail that the media has curiously left out is the fact the two executives died within 48 hours of each other, within one hour of the same restaurant. The means of the duo's apparent simultaneous demise has thus far been left obscured. There was some vague language in Nobu, the official news account, suggesting that the cause of death of the one was the other's lifelong bed, though the balance of the facts made one wonder if death by ogura (crab) was in fact the true cause. There was also some mystery regarding which of the execs actually died. However, the other day the word came down via a source on the streets of Kyoto that both executives had died, on the same day and the same restaurant. The basis for this report comes from a source in Tokyo who met Nobu in California last week. The source further claims Nobu was in the midst of more or less preparing another speech of some sort, and had very precisely 100 hours (written-out pages) of various articles or statements about himself and his company Osogeisha, wherein he had previously listed many of his lies, as well as omissions of other facts that he had done everything conceivable to cover up. The source further indicated that at the time of his death, Nobu was not even protected by an anesthesiologist. What's weird about this is that in Japan today at 5:30 p.m., the time when both executives died, the word was in the press that Osogeisha and Nobu had both made some sort of statement. Whatever the actual cause of death was, the workers at Osogeisha that were present at the time didn't know any better, and reported it as if a flood had occurred first, then they reported that an earthquake had occurred. Is there any significance to the fact that in both cases,
