Objectively, patients with oesophageal atresia and tracheo-oesophageal fistula have been associated with a lower birth weight and similar gestational age compared to children with isolated oesophageal atresia ([@b4]). This is consistent with our finding that the mean birth weight was higher in the combined study group than in patients with isolated oesophageal atresia (P = 0.04). According to several reports, cardiorespiratory complications are more common in children with complex congenital heart disease and atresia ([@b5],[@b6]). The respiratory challenges experienced by patients with oesophageal atresia and tracheo-oesophageal fistula are many. The initial management of patients is usually supportive, and this mainly entails O2 supplementation and feeding using methods which decrease the risk of aspiration. The management of patients with tracheo-oesophageal fistula requires invasive procedures such as gastrostomy and feeding jejunostomy. In our study, gastrostomy and jejunostomy were performed in 21 and 18 patients, respectively. The other surgical procedures performed were tracheoplasty in 10 patients and
