The mutagenic activity of nitroxide free radicals is currently a subject of wide interest. Studies of nitroxide-induced mutagenesis have focused primarily on direct-acting agents such as HNNO and ONOO-, and nitroxide-derived nitric oxide (NO). The oxidative deamination of a wide range of natural amines and amides by HNNO has been reported in various organisms. This process may also lead to the production of a range of nitro- and nitroso-analogues of the corresponding amino acids, which can act as mutagens. We have observed a large induction in mutation in Lactococcus lactis by the nitroxide-mediated deamination of lysine, alanine, and valine and have found that the induction is completely dependent on the presence of peroxy-nitrous acid, which is generated from NO by the autooxidation of nitroxide. The mechanisms of this mutagenesis are complex and the specific pathway(s) involved are unresolved. With regard to the mutagenic effects of NO, the role of endogenous nitric oxide as a mutagen in the rat colon has been reported, although it is not clear whether the mutagenic effect is mediated by NO or a metabolite. It was recently reported that NO generated by various "nanozymes" containing transition metals and enzymes (myoglobin, Cu-Zn superoxide dismutase, and glutathione peroxidase) can induce mutations in eukaryotic cells and it was proposed that copper may act as a mutagenic pro-oxidant. In addition, NO can function as a signalling molecule, that is released by cells and interacts with various target molecules via a range of biological activities. It is proposed that understanding the activity of nitroxide-derived free radical species at the molecular level may ultimately lead to the development of effective cancer chemotherapies. ? ????????. ??? ?????? ?????????????? ????????????
