That's what happened when a female Macbeth cast member told colleagues she was leaving the production, and her employer reportedly retaliated against her for speaking up. According to the New York Times, the unnamed woman was cast in the lead role in 2015, when she was in her 20s. The Times reports that after some rehearsals, the actress expressed concern that she had not been paid for her time on the play, which would run from February to September. The actress said that she had been told she would get a percentage of ticket sales and that she was not getting any of her production fees. The Times reports that the actress also complained to other cast members about inequities in the pay.

When the director told her to go home and wait to be contacted, the Times reports, the actress shared her concerns with her other colleagues. A few days later, she was removed from the production — but was not given an explanation why. The actress was paid for her time on the show and then offered a role in a different production, but was reportedly offered a pay cut.

According to the Times, the actress was told she “had to lay low and could not complain about the company.” Eventually, she resigned from the show and told her managers at the theatre company that she felt pressured to keep quiet, the Times reports.
