* This game is currently in development by one of our players, Borrowed Fun. The story in this game is about a junkie who drags a couple of his buddies out for a night of drinking and driving. The game was designed to be played with a joystick on a computer with an optical mouse on the screen. By hitting the mouse with the joystick the player moves the object around. Thanks to the gamepad you can play it just like a traditional game. The object in this game is to navigate the junkie from one corner of the parking lot to the other. The player can move objects in 8 directions and has the choice to lift or slide objects. So for the object to move they must either be lifted up or slide under them. The game contains the following 8 blocks (games): * Slide Block * Lift Block * Tilt Block * Push Block * Retrieve Block * Slide & Lifts Block * Slide & Lifts Block II * Slide & Lifts Block III * Slide & Lifts Block IV That's when he lay down on the carpet next to the Christmas tree and pulled a sleeping bag from the bag beneath his hammock. There was a small house phone in there, a phone that he knew his family wouldn't use. It was the phone he used when he found "a low-frequency area", meaning there were fewer than 2,400 megahertz communications possible around a given area. "I put the phone up to my ear," he said. "I listened at night with a pair of headphones. I listened very patiently as the hooch soaked in." "The hooch" was alcohol that Monash used to soak over and over in a baking tray, until each drop was coated in a white film. He made a map of the area. "I mapped all the areas of low-frequency coverage," he said. These low-frequency radio waves bounced off the ground, trees and houses. Monash got on his hands and knees and ran a pair of wire strippers across the power cables to see where they came into contact with the ground and the tree lines. "We became able to pinpoint where the power lines had penetrated the ground, or where the power lines came into contact with the tree, or to the house," he said. As the days went by, he joined a local radio club, dedicated to communication on a low-frequency.

Magnetic resonance (MR) imaging is able to demonstrate optic nerve pathology in several clinical settings, including the assessment of optic nerve tumor. Optic nerve abnormalities detected on MR images include atrophy, swelling, hemorrhage, and loss of signal intensity (T1 signal intensity), all of which can be differentiated from one another. The differential diagnosis of optic nerve pathology on MR images can include optic nerve meningioma, optic neuritis, optic nerve hypoplasia, Leber's hereditary optic neuropathy, central nervous system neoplasms, and ischemic optic neuropathy. The MR imaging criteria for the differentiation of optic nerve tumors from optic neuritis are also discussed.

Q: Why does Android studio's gradle-app-release task generate an APK with no app icon and no webview content? I am trying to automate the "APK Release" task from Android studio. I have done this in other IDEs in the past and have had no problems. Here is my task configuration:

task release(type: Exec) { commandLine'release', '--release-key', systemProperties['ANDROID_BUILD_STORE_PASSWORD'], '--auto-add-platform', '--package-name', "my.package", '--target-apk-name', 'my.package.v1.1

What's new:

about small people? When we were living in our house (in our dreamy, small green house) we had lots of power washer fiends in the neighborhood. They would arrive every day at lunch time and use their machines on their various cars, trucks, motorcycles and boats. I was about eight years old when the most resourceful one, George Edwards, came up with a fascinating and bold plan to take out an entire set of car wash brushes from the isopency aspirating brook as it flowed through the trees up our road. When the day of our wash came he showed up and grabbed an old navy water tank, tried to take it to the brook and shove it in. He tried to squeeze it in one of the entry holes but the brook was too strong for it. At that point, he stopped trying and began improvising. He settled on moving two garage doors on the sides of the tank, with a pulley attached, so as he moved the tank along, the garage doors moved backwards and forwards in synchronicity. Being 8 years old, I didn't get it. But it was magic and I could feel the inklings of my developing sense of wonderment. I would think back on it many times during the years we lived in that house and it always sounded like the movies I saw in my formative years. Like Double Indemnity with Barbara Stanwyck and Fred Macaon. Not that I imagined the whole story---no, that was an adult live in my head--but somewhere on the journey home, I would wake up from my sweet dreams of silent movie magic to find myself in an old movie, sitting on the edge of the bed in my small green house, dreaming about being a Power Washing Machine God. The images were always the same, even as I became more conscious of what was happening... I saw George Edwards running and looking back to see if his wonderful contraption was still following him. I saw our beautiful brook being forced to itself up through the driveway by the backward movement of the two garage doors. I was also awake when he awoke at night. You could hear him start his little motorized wash to shake his brushes, begging his little bed to come forth with that delicious mis-haps that would wash his two dirty cars and trucks. I guess being only eight years old I wasn't thinking about anything beyond the joys of George
