Parvovirus B19 (B19V) infection is an infectious disease known to cause clinical manifestations ranging from mild (hand-foot-mouth disease) to severe (erythema infectiosum). Asymptomatic infection with a significant rise in viral load is common, including during an acute infection. We report a paediatric emergency department patient who developed neutropenia with a positive B19V IgM antibody. Following an initial rise in B19V IgM and IgG seroconversion, the neutropenia improved over four days, with a second positive B19V IgM and negative B19V IgG. This case report also highlights the need for consideration of B19V infection in the differential diagnosis of patients presenting with neutropenia.DROP TABLE IF EXISTS t1; CREATE TABLE t1(c1 CHAR(10) NOT NULL); INSERT INTO t1 (c1) VALUES('abc'); SELECT * FROM t1; c1 abc DROP TABLE t1;
