ALLED [!!!!!!!!!!!!]

April 2007 Renewables hit bottom The incentive to save energy starts with the implementation of a "small supply-side market" with a defined framework for small suppliers to sell power generated from renewable sources like solar power photovoltaic and wind power. Shared, smart grids Power supplies beyond the reach of high-voltage transmission lines are often distributed using microgrids, generating energy from multiple renewable sources and storing them for later use. Suppliers could pool resources in microgrids and use standard medium and high-voltage power grids. "We believe this technology can also be expanded to the supply-side of the main power supply," said Parvez Alam, Director-General of the International Energy Agency, in a presentation to the International Renewable Power Conference in Istanbul this week. Renewables could thrive He added that "in the next two years, while the producers of electricity are generating electricity for nearly half of their production, renewable power producers may be providing electricity for some 20 per cent." Alam also said that the world had got to 80 per cent of its potential in terms of the use of highly available energy, despite having only a 0.2 per cent share of the global power supply. There were some special benefits of renewables, including the potential of using natural gas more efficiently and uses like power generation, he said. "We're entering a new era with renewable energy," he said. "We will learn to live within our natural resource base." Low-cost solutions All of this highlights low-cost, high-quality potential of new technologies like wind power and solar power. To make the experience of renewable users easier and cleaner, a "small
