Lamont MacKenna was crowned the bridesmaid at his cousin's wedding in North Carolina last year when he found out that he was really the boy in the family picture who was adopted as an infant. MacKenna was just 8 weeks old when he was adopted by Sarah Deily and Joseph MacKenna. He was put in a young child's jogging suit, and given the name Lamont Joseph. He had no idea about who he was. His birth mother, Leila Howell, said she kept her son's existence a secret because she feared other children would reject him. "I feel like I was just robbed of my child," Howell told People. "I can't look in their eyes and say, 'I'm your mom.'" But people kept reaching out to them. A friend of Howell's mother recognized MacKenna on a photo from the family's adoption agency. "From the time he was 8 weeks old, he looked like me," MacKenna said. "It's very hard to explain what it feels like when you realize that your life from that point on was a lie. And from there, I tried to run in the direction of the truth." McKenna met Howell, who is now 19, for the first time after she posted on the internet about her son, and the two talked for the first time about 10 years ago. Howell

The iconic, circa 1930s art deco river traffic structure, at the intersection of the Bronx and Harlem rivers near City Hall, is sometimes referred to as the "I-Hotel." And that name change reflects a shift in thinking about the bridge, and the city it crosses. It wasn't always called the Floating Bridge. Part of what makes it so memorable is how it got its name. The bridge was actually called the Lexington Avenue Bridge from the time it opened in 1931, through 1936, when it was renamed the "Gray-Cortelyou Bridge." In 1936, Mayor Fiorello La Guardia renamed it the "Downtown Skyway" — a name that still stuck. It was only after the city began to think about World War II that the New York Times decided that the bridge needed a change. So the newspaper proposed the name "Floating Bridge." You can see its statue on Canal Street in Manhattan. At its widest point — from center to center — the bridge is just under 400 feet long. The bridge is now operated by Amtrak, as are the tracks that are part of its Northeast Corridor. There is no ferry or pedestrian access. But the bridge has long been a place to wonder about. "It's got a mystique about it," says architect Frank Gehry, a reference to his first thoughts on the bridge. "It's sort of like a ghost ship — the floating bridge." "It goes on the skyline and it floats by, so it's really kind of magical if you ever see it," he says. That magic was captured in the 1996 film "Ghost," starring Patrick Swayze and Demi Moore. John Ford plays a journalist who has to solve the mystery surrounding the mystery-maker, the bridge's namesake, "Floating" Mike Vesey.

"Being in the city was a great experience. You know, it's one of my favorite cities," says Ed Begley Jr
