In this study we report the early magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) features of the colorectal cancer (CRC) mouse model induced by 1,2-dimethylhydrazine. We applied gadolinium-diethylenetriaminepentaacetic acid (Gd-DTPA) to the external anal sphincter (EAS) of Balb/c mice and followed the signal enhancement pattern of the cancer using both MRI with the inversion recovery (IR) technique and histopathological analysis. At week 0, all the mice showed the typical hyperplasia/adenomatous lesions in the colon, and the lesions were well established at week 8. Imaging with the IR technique revealed a conspicuous change in signal intensity in the rectum at week 1,

Development SolTran International was a project funded jointly by the United States Department of Defense and United States Air Force using funding from their RDT&E (Research, Development and Technology) funds. The project was initially conceived as an attempt to develop a wider application of the Shannon Technology program (the former Jane's Aircraft Pilot's Encyclopedia article on it) to design a jet-powered strategic bomber aircraft and superfortress capable of crossing the Atlantic Ocean in less than an hour. This was not successful, and the developers of the aircraft ultimately decided to design a military transport/bomber aircraft instead. The SolTran International was conceived as both a nuclear-powered bomber and tanker capable of carrying up to two nuclear bombs, but its design was never completed. The National Museum of the United States Air Force acquired the SolTran International in 2003. Design and development The SolTran International was designed as a supersonic twin-engine jet transport with similar plans to the Boeing Stratofreighter with nuclear reactors placed as storage in the wings, while
