Women in the growing business of handwoven cotton cloth manufacturing across Egypt are on the verge of being properly compensated for years of unpaid labor, activists say. After years of fighting for these workers and a supportive push from women across Egypt and across the globe, a U.N.-backed investigation in Egypt has finally confirmed what has been long suspected: that women in many of the country's textile plants were carrying out some of the most grueling, repetitive work in the sector, while receiving no pay beyond some basic living expenses. While activists say the investigation's findings confirm that those women are owed $2.6 billion in back pay, many of the plant's owners are resisting paying what could be as much as $1 billion in "social compensation" owed to these workers. Nearly 100 women have been making t-shirts, bed sheets, towels and other cotton cloth products, with help from nongovernmental organizations, since 2013 in the Mallawi district of Egypt's Minya province. But when the Mallawi plant employed about 340 workers, most of them women, owned and managed by Egyptian textile magnates Mohamed Hashem Abdel Ghaffar, Mohamed Faiza Hashem, Mohamed Abdel Aziz and Mohamed Abed Mansour, none of them were paid a cent for their work. Sweat shop "It's a sweat shop, but there is no way to call it that," said Shady Soliman, one of the Mallawi workers. "Workers are not protected, and even the factory owners are doing nothing." The global apparel and textile manufacturing industry is notoriously one
