NASA said its satellite measurements showed more than 70 percent of the Bering Sea - Alaska's western coast, was covered by a thick sheen of oil and gas leaking into the water from at least one underwater well. This stood in stark contrast to the East Siberian Sea, a shallow marine environment off Russia's coast closer to Vladivostok. There, the plume of hydrocarbons is less than 10 percent of the total area, and only half as strong. The data on the plume over the Bering Sea were collected primarily by NASA's Oceania Maritime Integrated National Ocean Observing System (AMIOS), as well as collaborating institutions from Australia, the US and New Zealand. "It's way, way more than elsewhere, everywhere," said AMIOS Director Dr. David Karlstrom of NASA's Oceanic Fisheries Science Center at the University of Alaska Fairbanks in Fairbanks. Bering Sea oil plume at 2014 Karlstrom found the concentration of hydrocarbons over a 45-day period by measuring the satellites' radio waves from the molecules in the plume. But, he pointed out that the concentrations were also varied on a daily basis, and could reflect major changes in ocean currents, topography or biological activity. Ed Smalley, a professor of ocean sciences at the University of Oregon, said the new findings were somewhat in line with earlier satellite data taken by NASA's Jason-3 satellite released last year. Jason-3 found little evidence of oil in the Bering Sea from May through September 2016, but showed substantial evidence of oil on or around the sea's shores and in the water column. How oil spills affect wildlife Small mammals, including the western and northern populations of the Steller sea lion, were found to be particularly vulnerable to oil spills. Leading animal rights organization, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, called for the Arctic to be declared "an Oiled Ocean
