Support to trouble shoot.The present invention relates to a digital demodulation circuit and, more particularly, to a circuit for demodulating a digital modulated signal. Digital modulated signals, such as quadrature amplitude modulation signals, are used in many applications, including communication applications. Quadrature amplitude modulation is usually understood to mean the frequency modulation of at least two carrier signals that are shifted 90 degrees with respect to one another, in the sense that the signals are still mutually in phase but with a phase offset of 90 degrees. If the modulation scheme is linear, the demodulated signal will be a linear combination of the two modulation signals, and the combining coefficients can be determined easily. If the modulation is more complex, and there are several modulating waveforms being used, determining the combining coefficients becomes a much more complex problem. In this more complex case, a demodulation circuit is employed to obtain the combining coefficients, and then the demodulated signal is output. Many quadrature modulated signals can be described by an amplitude and a phase component (i.e. a modulating waveform), e.g.,
