Workshop on Digestive System Diseases..It is well known that the degree of difficulty in starting a vehicle engine varies from day to day depending upon many factors. These factors include temperature, the age and condition of the engine, the air-to-fuel ratio of the mixture being burned in the combustion chambers, and the relative age of the engine oil. In order to avoid starting difficulties, it is customary to utilize an engine starter with ignition retardation capabilities. There are three basic types of ignition systems in use at this time. The first type of system, known as "idle retarded," allows the engine to idle and then retard the igniter timing after an air intake valve is closed. A second type of system is known as "compression retarded." This system allows the engine to run until the point at which it is desired to accelerate the engine. Then, the engine is stopped and ignited. A third type of system is known as "exhaust retarded." After the engine has been running for a predetermined period of time, it is allowed to finish its run. Then, the igniter is fired and the engine is accelerated. A particular problem of the exhaust-retarded system is the long delay that is generally experienced between engine startup and actual ignition. This excessive delay tends to cause premature deceleration of the engine as it idles, especially when it is cold. It is desirable that this additional delay be reduced.on: [push, pull_request, issues] 6d1f23a050
