mandatory ultrasonographic screening effective in the diagnosis of metachronous contralateral testicular germ cell tumors? It is difficult to determine the optimal management strategy for patients with metachronous contralateral testicular cancer to prevent relapse because this is a rare malignancy.

Patients with germ cell testicular cancer at a first or second diagnosis are at a high risk of relapse.

Ultrasonographic screening after orchiectomy is an effective method for the detection of contralateral testicular neoplasms. This study aimed to evaluate the clinical utility of ultrasonographic screening in metachronous contralateral testicular tumors. In total, 227 patients who underwent orchiectomy for germ cell tumors were followed up for 5-36 years. All patients with abnormal findings detected by ultrasonography were examined by orchiectomy and then sent for exploratory laparotomy. A total of 44 patients (19.5 %) had abnormal findings in the contralateral testis, and orchiectomy was performed on the affected testis. Thirty-four patients (30.9 %) had false-positive findings and nine (8.3 %) had false-negative findings. The overall sensitivity of ultrasonography was 61.9 % (32 of 53 patients), and the specificity was 50 % (18 of 36 patients). In patients with ipsilateral tumor, the sensitivity was 82.1 % (8 of 10 patients).

Patients with a unilateral tumor at first diagnosis and those with contralateral seminoma were found to have a higher risk of ipsilateral tumor recurrence. It is very difficult to select the optimal strategy for patients with germ cell tumors with contralateral testicular neoplasms detected by ultrasonographic screening. Therefore, orchiectomy of the affected testis would be adequate for those patients who have a high risk of ipsilateral relapse. The risks and benefits must be considered in those who have a low risk of ipsilateral relapse.
