Mobile streaming video is built on the idea of file downloads. The first file is the movie, which then plays in the background while you're viewing another file. But what if there's more than one file playing at once? Imagine being able to watch a video online at the same time as listening to a song from your Smartphone, or having a Skype call going while you're watching a video. That's what mobile streaming video enables. Research firm comScore has reported that mobile streaming video was used by an estimated 7.8 million American consumers in 2010. Although most people don't watch more than one video at a time, using mobile streaming video is growing quickly. Increasingly more time is spent watching or listening to video and audio on smartphones and tablets. Users are using it not only to stream video, but also to listen to music, view photos and browse the internet. This brings with it some challenges for content owners and the creators who provide it. A mobile app that streams audio or video without being downloaded can be used to sneakily access premium content without paying.

On the flip side, the same quality of content requires a fast data connection. A slow or limited internet connection can either hinder the audio or video stream quality or prevent the user from watching the content at all. Video also requires a stable internet connection. Users who are using their cell phone or tablet for streaming video in a moving vehicle for instance will notice frequent buffering and pauses. Other movies may take a bit longer to download as the files are bigger, and may need to be purchased on a disc. Also, you may be more likely to see a file size in Kilobytes, rather than Megabytes. For example, an 18MB file can take up to an hour to download. If you want to watch a film now, or have it ready in case you want to binge watch later you will need to ensure you have enough storage. All smartphones are unlikely to come with large internal storage, so unless you are prepared to invest in a premium device you're going to need to think about planning ahead. You can use online storage providers like Mega or Dropbox to collect your files and upload them to your handset. If you're planning to watch a lot of movies you will need to make sure your data plan allows for it. If you're not connected to a Wi-Fi network your handset can still download files using the internet. Obviously, this can get expensive very quickly! 5ec8ef588b
