figures from the international organization for standardization (iso) indicated that over the next decade, 3d printing is set to transform industrial manufacturing, meaning manufacturers will have to start thinking about how to print for such a process. the drawback of a direct injection system is that it is not thermally stable, requiring the nozzle to be made from copper, which in turn limits the material selection. using ceramic, which is too brittle for the nozzle design, can create problems with crack formation, requiring the nozzle to be redesigned. using a droplet emulsion could give better thermal stability and provide the possibility of using a wider range of materials. though easier to design, the droplet emulsion approach comes at the expense of the nozzle being made up of tens of micron sized liquid droplets, which means the nozzle is prone to jamming and clogging up. this new design creates a needle-less orifice, which supports larger droplets. the new design also reduces the possibility of nozzle clogging, while increasing the thermal stability. according to the iaea, it is estimated that approximately 25 percent of all proven fossil fuel reserves around the world will have to be economically and technically recovered and processed with the potential to produce 5 to 6 billion tonnes of recyclable waste of various types. nuclear energy, as a widely recognized efficient and clean technology for power generation, may play a key role in bringing the necessary changes and support the recovery of the nuclear fuel materials. three united arab emirates-based companies, al wathba water, dp-itt and oasis water, have received a $10.75 million loan from adb group to support the expansion of their abu dhabi production facility. the facility is expected to be able to produce 10,000 cubic meters of clean water daily with only water and electricity. this upgrade is expected to help the companies to reduce costs and become more competitive. 5ec8ef588b
