I've been involved with JTAG since it started in the mid 80s and have yet to see a single JTAG device that has not been open source (and true open source/source), in fact the microcontrollers are generally not even that much more powerful than when JTAG started. So with the release of JTAG it seems to be a little late for there to be an anti-tug of arms movement in JTAG (although likely with some support from the FOSS camp). Still I see many here who think that simply because it's a new technology it must be restricted to proprietary use, which is surely to narrow a view of what is happening. The 100+ years from JTAG to FOSS BTW are no more than the time it takes to read an EN article, which is two seconds, so it's less than a blip on the radar. It wasn't until this year that I saw any kind of JTAG software that seemed more than just a basic demo of what JTAG is capable of, and it was such a basic demo that I had to find out for myself from the manufacturer. So I'd prefer to see the current crop of JTAG software being improved to be like this, rather than waiting for it to be JTAG the way FOSS has been JTAG for a century already. I recommend the program JTAG if you want to try out JTAG, the Demo can be started manually in the Win32 executable. On the setup screen you can select which tool to include. The tool can be uninstalled from the Windows system installer that runs the installer itself, that part is automated. The whole thing is neat! While it's well laid out and simple, I don't like how the download of the demo is automated on execution of the Demo without any ability to configure this, other than choosing a JTAG-enabled device to try it on. You can use a JTAG compatible USB-JTAG adaptor for remote control access, but that's risky due to the lack of control over the OS.
