Human monocytes can be induced to express HLA-DR (DR2, DR4, DR5) specific for the long form of protein, human cytochrome c, but not for short form protein (human myoglobin). Human peripheral blood monocytes were examined for the expression of HLA-DR specific for the short form of protein (human myoglobin) and for the long form of protein (human cytochrome c). As a control for the specificity of the DR expression, a single allele of HLA-DR, DR4, was introduced into a large population of human peripheral blood monocytes using a temperature-sensitive mutation in the human beta 2-microglobulin gene. DR4 was detected on the surface of the modified human peripheral blood monocytes by flow cytometry using a monoclonal antibody directed against the DR4 determinant and confirmed by the ability of the modified human peripheral blood monocytes to stimulate an autologous MHC-restricted cytotoxic T-cell clone specific for human cytochrome c. Studies with monoclonal antibodies directed against different regions of the DR4 molecule and a human lymphoblastoid cell line, DR4+, indicated that the long form of protein (cytochrome c) elicited the expression of DR4 whereas the short form of protein (human myoglobin) did not. Thus, human monocytes express a DR specific for the long form of protein (cytochrome c) and not for the short form. The exact role of this molecule and the DR-positive monocyte in immune system responses is not yet known. The detection of a monocyte specific for an MHC-restricted antigen is a unique finding and may help to explain some aspects of the various immune responses. a member of a political party is not alone in that circumstance."
