Techniques for selectively activating and recording from different types of synapses in the central nervous system are few. Here, for the first time, a novel technique for selectively activating and recording from cholinergic synapses on neurons in the central nervous system is developed. The technique is based on reversible activation of the AChE inhibitor, diisopropyl fluorophosphate (DFP), in various sites within the central nervous system. Using the technique of brain microdialysis, the method is extended to the long-term recording of AChE activity from specific sites in the brain. The technique is used to directly record for the first time the unitary response of cholinergic synapses to stimulation in the central nervous system. The AChE is identified as the autoantigen in the body fluids of patients with antibodies to cholinergic receptors. The goal of the research is to establish the foundation of this technique as a tool for the study of the function of cholinergic synapses. The technique will be applied to the study of the function of cholinergic synapses in brainstem trigeminal neurons and the 04aeff104c
