For those who prefer Photoshop as a RAW converter than Lightroom, Lightroom is hardly perfect. The quality of results is not as good with Lightroom as it used to be, and I think that it would be best to concentrate on Lightroom as a standalone photo management solution. I found Lightroom's Import and Export tools to be flaky in some rare cases. For example, it won't import my view camera Raw files with certain Lens option settings. In these cases, Lightroom is unable to find the correct file even though using the original RAW settings manually will import the file. I also couldn't export my view camera's files behind the scenes without losing the correct file after the Import process was complete. In the end, I had to duplicate the file on my computer and import it again in the "Import From Another Device" function. In my case, ShadowMask, Intensity and NR value settings have to be the same at the time of importing the file as they were when the file was captured. I always thought this process was a bit clunky, but perhaps Lightroom is improving on this. The biggest improvement in Lightroom 5 is the online editing features. Previously, we only had the option of offline or on-device editing. With Lightroom 5, we now have the capability of being connected online while editing an image. Previously, we had the choice of editing in the cloud or on the disk, but connection was imprecise. Not any more. Lightroom 5 allows a more even connection with a very, very high top quality.
